A single copy of the daily Federal Register, including postage, is based on the. Application of the Employee Polygraph Protection Act,. 57981â€"Â ."We have to go to the same place we went a few years ago," said Mike Scioscia, who was a Dodgers starter in the previous two All-Star Game appearances. "Right back to the top, and we'll play each other the best we can and see who's there at the end of it." It's not the way anyone would have predicted, but the second half of 2012 was the second-best summer in baseball history. The season has been dominated by the Majors' biggest names and it's been full of heartbreak, until now. So while this is the midway point of the season and the trade deadline approaches, the All-Star game offers a chance for the fans to feel a little bit like old times. The All-Star Game will be held on Tuesday at Great American Ball Park in Cincinnati, so this may be the last chance to see L.A. players represented before the trade deadline. "The real All-Star Game is never really about the players," Sweeny Murti said, reflecting on the impact players like Albert Pujols have had on the game. "It's about the fans, the players and the tradition. I'm looking forward to it. This will be a good All-Star Game." Pujols was the face of the game in 2007 and has been one of the National League's main attractions, with the Cardinals playing a significant role in the NL's divisional win. But if there's any impact players who bring players to the All-Star Game, it's the Dodgers. They're the team that has filled the leaderboards and stolen the spotlight this season. At least there's a little extra intrigue with them because they're in the midst of a dramatic deal that may see them play together for the last time. Something fun happens at the All-Star Game, because that's what we're used to, and it's definitely unusual to see a team play in consecutive games. "It's interesting," Bronson Arroyo said. "That's just something, the tradition of the game -- you come, you play and you get out of there. But I think it's real special when you put your team together. You put your guys together for the last time. This is an important time
